
Yaser El-Waly and the Importance of Fairness in Everyday Life

Choosing Justice in Small Moments

For years now, Yaser El-Waly has lived in Perth, Australia, and his faith is still influencing how he tackles his daily chores. Having reached the age of fifty, he believes that justice does not lie only in big issues or courts. It rather lies in our small activities during the day and determines how we talk, listen and interact with each other.

Years of study of the Muslim faith have taught him that justice should begin at an individual level before it is expected of others. One should be just in his or her speech, actions, and behavior before asking someone else to be the same.

Looking Beyond Personal Interests

It is evident that Yaser El-Waly often contemplates on the speed at which emotions influence one's decision-making process. Whether it concerns any problems regarding the family, his friends, or even the community, he wants everyone to be fair in their approach and make a well-informed decision.

He is convinced that in order to act fairly, it is necessary to listen carefully. One should know the other person's point of view, check the data and avoid any assumptions. This can lead to better relations without any conflicts. For him, justice is inseparably linked with the sense of accountability before Allah. Those who understand this will act with dignity.

Fairness Within Family and Community

Family is the first place, according to Yaser El-Waly, where justice should be applied. He frequently talks about respecting members of the family, resolving conflicts amicably and making sure that kindness is always a part of interaction.

This dedication goes beyond the family through his teaching, mentoring and charitable deeds in Perth. He holds the belief that healthy communities can only be formed by acting justly regardless of the individual’s position, status, or background. Every instance of justice adds up to creating trust amongst individuals.

Living with Integrity

Those familiar with Yaser El-Waly generally perceive a person whose principles revolve around making well-thought decisions and having a balanced perspective of things.
